During the late 1670s, Dutch microscopist Anton van Leeuwenhoek ground his own single-lens devices and became the first to observe bacteria, protozoans, and other microorganisms. He was able to "dissect and reconstruct" tiny structures that until recently had been unknown, unseen, and unstudied. The story begins on page 24.